

BEATS OF THE ANTONOV

A REFUGEE CLUB / BIG WORLD CINEMA PRODUCTION

STORY CONSULTANT EPHREM KOSSAIFY CONSULTANT EDITOR EREZ LAUFER CONSULTING PRODUCER BRIAN TILLEY SOUND DESIGNER BARRY DONNELLY
PRODUCTION COORDINATOR TAMSIN RANGER ASSOCIATE PRODUCER KENIKA MEGAN MUSIC PRODUCER ALSARAH EDITORS HAJOOJ KUKA, KHALID SHAMIS
PRODUCERS STEVEN MARKOVITZ, HAJOOJ KUKA DIRECTOR & CINEMATOGRAPHER HAJOOJ KUKA

- Winner of the People's Choice Documentary Award, TIFF 2014
- Winner of the Best Feature Documentary Award, Cordoba African Film Festival 2015
- Winner of the Audience Award for Feature Documentary, Angers African Film Festival 2015
- Winner of the Main Jury Prize for Feature Documentary, Angers African Film Festival 2015
- Winner of the Grand Nile Prize for Best Documentary, Luxor African Film Festival 2015
- Winner of the Best Documentary Award, Durban International Film Festival 2015
- Winner of the Arterial Network's Artwatch Africa Award for Freedom of Expression, Durban International Film Festival, 2015

BEATS OF THE ANTONOV tells the story of the people of the Blue Nile and Nuba Mountains in Sudan, showing how they deal with civil war. Traditionally music has always been part of daily life in these areas but now it has a new role in a society challenge by war.

Directed by hajooj kuka
SUDAN/SOUTH AFRICA, 2014
Arabic with English subtitles
68 minutes | Colour | DCP & HDCAM
Producer: Steven Markovitz, hajooj kuka
Director of photography: hajooj kuka
Editor: hajooj kuka, Khalid Shamis
Music producer: AlSarah

This documentary has been realised with the IDFA Bertha Fund

Synopsis

Sudan is doing whatever it can to get rid of the rebel forces in the Blue Nile areas and the Nuba mountains. Its way of doing this is to obliterate their base. Their base is the people, the villagers who have now been forced to gather in mountain hideouts or refugee camps. But still the bombings continue and so does the fight back, led by the rebel forces. hajooj kuka has been on the ground filming for over eighteen months. This film takes the viewer through the lives of displaced people who lost family members, homes, farms and belongings. But instead of finding a devastated and defeated people we find a vibrant culture, people who have found new purpose and energy in the face of conflict. The response to the violence is often singing, dancing, laughter and marvelous music that comes from the root of their culture. Through this journey we understand the Sudanese conflict that stems from a war on identity.

While it is a story set in a time and place of conflict it is also a story of a people coming to terms with their culture and identity, and facing the idea that the question of identity is at the heart of the conflict. Sudan has always had tension or conflict between the so-called Arab north and African south. This still underlies this conflict playing out in areas of North Sudan as the Khartoum government tries to impose not only their rule, but their culture.

Trailer: <http://youtu.be/fi3ronTd3xg?list=UUv5QWwvhixD0asF3KTSR6RA>

Production Notes

by Rasha Salti, TIFF Programmer

The separation [secession] of Sudan into two sovereign states has not prevented the longest civil war in the African continent from flaring up again. The conflict in the regions of the Blue Nile and Nuba mountains remains yet unresolved. Their inhabitants, who had fought for the independence of the South Sudan, continue to fight for their cultural, social and economic rights.

Director hajooj kuka has been following farmers, herders and rebels of the Blue Nile and Nuba mountains, since October 2012, as they have had to re-assemble in mountain hide-outs and refugee camps for safety from the air raids waged by the government of Sudan, using Russian-made Antonov cargo planes, that target civilians notoriously without any discrimination. After the air raids, it is not unusual to hear the ring of laughter and sounds of music [among these communities], out of relief that lives have been spared, but also as steadfast resistance to safeguard cultural traditions, collective memory and as defiance against the indignity of displacement.

Beats of the Antonov lenses eloquently on the everyday life of people who have lost kin, homes and farms, but instead of devastation and defeat, we discover communities emboldened to celebrate their heritage with vibrancy, their response to violence is singing, dancing, and improvising creative ways to continue harvesting their crops and raising cattle. Kuka threads voices of militants, social workers, intellectuals and everyday folk to tell the story a complex conflict reclaiming the humanity of refugees and reversing with inspiring lucidity representations of victimhood.

Director Biography

hajooj kuka is a filmmaker from Sudan, currently based between Nairobi, Kenya and Nuba Mountains, Sudan. He is the creative director of 3ayin.com, a website that works with local reporters aimed at bringing the news of the war through short documentaries, to the Sudanese people. hajooj is a regular contributor to nubareports.org. His previous work includes the 2009 documentary, Darfur's Skeleton (52 min), which explores the conflict in Sudan's troubled region since 2003. He has also worked as a director and editor at Alhurra TV station in Washington DC and at the production company Shilo Inc in New York.

Producer Biography

Steven Markovitz has been producing fiction and documentaries for 20 years in Africa. His fiction films include Viva Riva! (Toronto, Berlinale), Proteus (Toronto, Berlinale) African Metropolis (Toronto, Rotterdam, Locarno) and Love the One You Love (Best South African Film, Durban 2014). His shorts have screened at Cannes, Sundance, Berlinale and an Oscar nomination. He recently had two films premiere at TIFF: Beats of the Antonov and Stories of Our Lives. He has produced many documentaries including Congo in Four Acts (Berlinale, Hotdocs, IDFA) and Project 10 (Sundance, Berlinale, Hotdocs, Tribeca). Steven is currently producing films in Nigeria, Libya, Liberia, Kenya, DRC, Ghana, Japan and USA.

Festivals & Sales

Steven Markovitz

Big World Cinema

T: +27 83 2611 044

E: steven@bigworld.co.za

Festivals and Screenings:

Toronto International Film Festival, 2014 (Winner of the People's Choice Documentary Award)
IDFA, 2014
Carthage Film Festival, 2014
Dubai International Film Festival, 2014
Goteborg Film Festival, 2015
FESPACO, 2015
International Film Festival and Forum on Human Rights, Geneva 2015
Human Rights Watch London Film Festival, 2015
Luxor African Film Festival, 2015 (Winner of the Grand Nile Prize for Best Feature Documentary)
Human Rights Watch, London, 2015
Flatpack Film Festival, Birmingham, UK, 2015
FCAT - Festival des Cine Africano, Cordoba, 2015 (Winner of the Best Feature Documentary Award)
Panama IFF, Panama, 2015
BAFICI, Buenos Aires, 2015
Film Theatre Kriterion, Amsterdam, 2015
AfryaKamera, Warsaw, Poland, 2015
San Francisco Int. Film Festival, San Francisco, 2015
Fisahara (Western Sahara IFF), Dakhla Refugee Camp, 2015
Helsinki African Film Festival, Helsinki, 2015
Human Rights Nights Film Festival, Bologna, Italy, 2015
Seattle Int. Film Festival, Seattle, 2015
Cinemas d'Afrique African Film Festival, Angers, France, 2015 (Winner of the Audience Award for Feature Documentary, Winner of the Main Jury Prize for Feature Documentary)
Encounters Documentary Film Festival, South Africa, 2015
Sydney International Film Festival, Australia, 2015
Human Rights Watch New York Film Festival, 2015
Ciné Droit Libre, Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso, 2015
Arab Film Festival Amman, Jordan, 2015
Durban International Film Festival, South Africa, 2015 (Best Documentary Award, & Arterial Network's Artwatch Africa Award for Freedom of Expression)
New Zealand International Film Festival, Auckland, 2015
Aux Ecrans Noirs, Yaounde, Cameroon, 2015
Africajarc, Cajarc, France, 2015
Stronger Than Fiction, Canberra, Australia, 2015
URKULT, Nämforsen, Sweden, 2015
Cinema Afrique, Lausannes, Switzerland, 2015
Brigham Young University USA, 2015
Cambridge African Film Festival, UK, 2015
Berklee Learning Center, US, 2015
Africa in Motion, UK, 2015
Kaohsiung Film Festival, Taiwan, 2015
Film Africa, Uk, 2015
Mizna's Twin Cities Arab Film Fest, USA, 2015
Escales Documentaires de Libreville, Gabon, 2015
Festival des Cinémas d'Afrique du Pays d'Apt, France, 2015
Meisei University, Japan, 2015

Arab League Human Rights Committee, Egypt, 2015
Music Freedom Day, Sweden 2016
Word Festival (woordfees), South Africa 2016
F.A.M.e, France 2016
Africa FilmFestival Leuven, Belgium 2016
Music Freedom Day, Sweden 2016
RapidLion – The International South African Film Festival, South Africa 2016
AFI (American Film Institute), USA 2016
North Kohala Public Library (Kapaau, HI) -2pm, USA 2016
Sudanese Community, Oman 2016
Human Rights FF, Australia 2016
Something Somewhere FF, Australia 2016
FilmInitiativ Koln, Germany 2016
Idealistic Illusions, The Alchemist, Kenya 2016
CinemART, Goethe-Zentrum Uganda, 2016
Kijiweni Cinema, Tanzania, 2016
Lusaka International Film & Music Festival, Zambia 2016
Goethe-Institut Cameroon, 2016
Semaine des Afriques, France 2017

Selected reviews:

This is the must-see film at the Durban International Film Festival this year

By: Charl Blignaut, July 20th 2015

Source: City Press- News24.com

Film: Beats of the Antonov

Directed by: hajooj kuka

Rating 9/10

As the Antonovs rumble overhead and the bombs begin to plunge to the ground, the refugee community in the Blue Nile village just outside the border of North Sudan scrambles into makeshift shelters. Once Omar al-Bashir's planes pass, they crawl out again, laughing infectiously, and the music begins. It's the first of many double-takes you will do during the punchy 68 minutes of Sudanese film maker hajooj kuka's debut feature documentary Beats of the Antonov. Laughter and celebration in a time of war?

Especially during the full moon, they and the refugee communities of the Nuba Mountains, will often dance and sing all night. It helps to stay awake when you're under threat of being bombed in the dark.

Played on a string instrument called the rababa, often crafted from recycled materials, the music is ancient. Many of the refugees have only just rediscovered it, and it restores their splintered African identity as Bashir's Arab project continues its waning march in a country split in two and then two again.

It's this music that first drew kuka to the project that would see him traveling to festivals around the world and lifting awards. As he and an ethnomusicologist friend Sarah Mohamed Abunama-Elgadi settled in to communal life in the refugee camps, the political impetus behind the music began to emerge. His truly extraordinary film dances a line between cultural expression and an exploration of identity in a pure, textured and impossibly complex Fanonian sense.

Far from the big city of Khartoum, the refugees – torn between lighter skinned Arab ideals, Christianity and its accompanying missionary position, and their ethnic roots (there are 57 different languages spoken in North and South Sudan) – learn through the war that owning their identity is their ultimate victory against Bashir, the man who calls them "black sacks" and who slipped out of South Africa recently, avoiding arrest for war crimes.

It is women who take up most of the camera time. "I believed them most," says kuka of the documentary's characters. Another flowering of identity in a time of war is this matriarchal dominance in the camps. That and a communal farming system and a development structure untainted by China and NGOs.

kuka went in to a war zone and found a (never idealised but poignantly celebrated) traditional African structure emerging as a political force shaped by resistance.

I don't want to say more, because you need to see the film, produced by kuka and South African Steven Markovitz, for yourself. Just this: Beats of the Antonov is the purest kind of cinema. One man and a camera that unpeels a story of the unmakings and makings of identity through cultural production, one where the musician and the audience is unseparated, where music is able to express both lament and healing.

It's the must-see film at the Durban International Film Festival this year.

Film Review: 'Beats of the Antonov'

By Jay Weissberg, January 2nd 2015

Source: Variety.com

The resilience of oppressed communities holding on to their culture is the theme of this standout documentary.

Among the innumerable films lost in the Toronto Film Festival's leviathan belly, "Beats of the Antonov" is a true standout deserving of a significant critical push. Hajooj Kuka's short yet eloquent, even optimistic documentary about the peoples and music along the war-ravaged border between North and South Sudan is an exemplar of how filmmakers can give dignity to refugees by allowing them their names and their voices. While music is the main feature, "Beats" is really a pic about the resilience of oppressed communities, whose ability to hold onto their culture enables them to remain unified. Notwithstanding Toronto's People's Choice Award for best documentary, further promotion is needed to spread the word among fests, showcases, and smallscreen programmers.

North Sudan's determined, unabashedly racist war against the ethnic groups to the south has resulted in the displacement of 1½ million people, many from the Blue Nile and Nuba Mountains areas. Kuka spent extended periods on the ground in refugee camps in those regions for nearly two years, filming heart-stopping bombardments from Ukrainian-made Antonov planes (hence the title) sent over by North Sudan and, almost more remarkably, communities regrouping to celebrate life. Music's integral place in their culture appears to strengthen ties and form a conscious barrier to the kind of despair usually recorded in similar camps.

It almost sounds too good to be true, and had it been lensed by a well-meaning outsider, the documentary would have seemed as if it were trying too hard to put an upbeat spin on things. Instead, Kuka speaks to the men and women here not as "refugees" but as individuals, identifying each talking head by name (an inexplicable rarity) and showcasing their intelligence as they freely discuss their culture, the racism of the north and the importance of music in their lives.

An example is Insaf Awad, persuasively talking about how culture protects a community and helps release the pain of displacement. Part of the power of her conversation is the way it puts paid to arguments that the loss of cultural signifiers is a minor price to pay for saving lives: Instead, Awad, and the entire documentary, posit culture as a vital component of every community, making clear that its loss creates an unhealable wound and significantly hampers a people's hoped-for recovery.

Part of the docu's thrust is the disparity between the north's push for homogeneity under a false pan-Arab banner, and the south's appreciation of diversity. Ibrahim Khatir, an officer in the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA), speaks of how a multiethnic society is a sign of strength (his declaration that the army is just a tool toward the creation of a just society is quite powerful), while others discuss the north's refusal to consider themselves African.

Interviews share screen time with uplifting scenes of music making, in which whole communities participate in song and dance, even in the camps. Ethnomusicologist Sarah Mohamed Abunama-Elgadi (aka Alsarah) explains that local rhythms lend themselves to freewheeling adaptation, democratizing compositions and especially lyric writing, as seen when a group of girls sing about such common problems as flies and diarrhea. “Beats of the Antonov” unequivocally demonstrates the essential role music plays in maintaining a sense of identity, not to mention hope for the future, among a people sorely worn down by the decades-long fighting.

Clever editing reinforces the docu’s thrust, juxtaposing disturbing strafings with men playing the rebaba (a stringed instrument) and communal dancing. Even without considering the difficult conditions Kuka worked under during much of his time in the camps, his lensing, shifting from smooth, handsomely composed shots to agitated images as he ducks for cover, captures the dignity, intelligence and joy of his subjects.

New film, “Beats of the Antonov,” unlike anything I have ever seen

DYLAN VALLEY | SEPTEMBER 15TH, 2014

Source: Africa is a Country

Every now and then, it seems as if there is nothing new out there. Everything seems derivative, repetitive or just plain bland. As a filmmaker, I sometimes go through moments of extreme lack of inspiration; and even question my choice of career. And then an unexpected spark happens to light the way. Beats of the Antonov, a new documentary from Sudanese filmmaker Hajooj Kuka, is such a spark. The film premiered last week at Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF), and is the second film by a Sudanese filmmaker to screen there. I wasn’t surprised when last night the film won the People’s Choice Documentary Award at the TIFF.

Kuka paints a beautiful picture of music, war and identity in the Blue Nile and Nuba regions, and the film is unlike anything I have ever seen.

The Antonov of the title comes from the Russian planes that are used by Omar Al-Bashir’s regime to bomb villages in Sudan. Instead of a dry journalistic account of the ongoing Sudanese conflict however, the film is a deep exploration of a nation in an identity crisis, with its ruling elite pushing an Arab nationalist identity onto a diverse African citizenry. The title of the film makes a correlation between the bombs of oppression and the resilience of culture, the music of a people and the suffering they endure.

The film uses a non-linear narrative style, not following any particular series of events, but rather is a collection of vignettes, many of which spring from spontaneous jam sessions in refugee camps. Kuka, who has also been a war reporter, caught the inspiration for the film while spending time in one of the refugee camps in the Blue Nile region. “The music sounded different than any other Sudanese music I had ever heard before, because they were made from found objects in the refugee camp,” Kuka told me over a coffee in Cape Town, where he finished post-production on the film, working with Big World Cinema producer Steven Markovitz and editor Khalid Shamis. “They created this contraption where they connected home made instruments to an old radio. They had created a new sound. It was amazing, and this is why I made the film; I fell in love with the music. It’s Sudanese music, but it’s a unique mixture of Sudanese traditional music that was born in a refugee camp. I was afraid that they didn’t realize how amazing this music was.”

In addition to head bopping jam sessions with instruments made of pipes, plates and old tires, some of the most compelling music in the film is the genre of “girl’s music” sung by the young women in the region. They are both oral history and snapshots of modern life. One of the songs deals with young men who are really just teenagers being sent to fight in the Sudanese Liberation

Army, with haunting lyrics like “those boots are too big for you.”

The film also takes a long hard look at what it means to be Sudanese today, and confronts the Arabization of Sudanese identity, an ideological displacement running as an undercurrent to the physical displacement of the refugees in Sudan. “Bashir himself is not that identity he wants to be,” Kuka says, and explains that with his long dreads and afro-centric mindset, he gets flack for not fitting the prescribed national identity. “Very few people fit this image of what is Sudanese. You have this fake image and 5% of the population fit it, and then you have 95% of people who are trying to fit it.”

One of the characters in the film is a young musician and ethnomusicologist named Alsara, named by Addis Rumble as “the princess of Nubian pop and Sudanese retro.” Alsarah, now based in Brooklyn, New York, has returned to Sudan to do field recordings and research in the Nuba region. In a traditional narrative documentary, it would have been an obvious choice to follow her on her journey to record the music and bring it to the West, however Kuka avoided making her or any single interviewee the subject of the film. “It’s normal for us to meet a lot of people in real life, so you meet a lot of people in this film. You don’t need one-character-driven stories. It’s not my style and I don’t think it’s needed... talking to a lot of people and talking to them in a way that’s less definitive will give you the experience of living this.”

The film succeeds in this endeavor, instead of telling you what to think about the Sudanese conflict, it gives you a sense of the realities on the ground, a feeling for the place, and the kinds of issues which people are thinking through. A person I know who saw the film said you had to experience the film with your heart, and not your head. Beats of the Antonov and its infectious music stayed with me for days after viewing it. Rather than giving any answers in this film, Hajooj Kuka asks a lot of important questions. “At the end what I want people to leave with is this complex idea of Sudan, rather than the simplified notion that the media gives you.” Kuka plans to expand into features in the future, and is excited about developing a unique voice and style. With more films like this coming from African directors, we could be witnessing the start of a new canon of African film.

TIFF Docs 2014: “Beats of the Antonov” shows the celebration of culture as the defiant assertion for diversity

By Patrick Mullen, September 8th, 2014

Source: POV Magazine

Beats of the Antonov

(Sudan/South Africa, 65 min.)

Dir. Hajooj Kuka

Programme: TIFF Docs (World Premiere)

The concept of national cinema is out of fashion these days. That concept has become as old-fashioned as the auteur theory as transnational and world cinema have become hotter commodities and buzzwords for capturing the currents of contemporary film. There is still value, however, in using films to explore and to articulate national consciousness, especially when the fluidity and intangibility of such an identity—or perhaps its impossibility—forms the core of a film. Hajooj Kuka’s impressive documentary Beats of the Antonov looks at Sudan in a time of flux, chronicling the tensions between the villagers in the regions of the Blue Nile and Nuba mountains and the rebels in the outlying areas.

Beats of the Antonov sets the story to two very different beats. The titular beats of the title comes from the bombs dropped by Russian-made Antonov planes helmed by the Sudanese government. These bombs mean to annihilate the militia, but they target and devastate the villagers with equal measure. The film opens with a bombing scene that is jarring, not merely for the rocky force of the impact that shakes the frame, but for the chorus of villagers who emerge from their shelters after the bomb drops and unite in a collective chorus of healing and dance.

Some of the best insight comes from Sarah Abunama-Elgadi, a Sudanese ethnomusicologist who studies the music of the villagers and situates their rhythms in a larger academic discourse. “Everyone has the right to play their own music,” she notes, stressing that the assortment of sounds forms a greater harmony. Beats of the Antonov takes the hybridity of the music of the villagers as a microcosm for a larger cultural debate of national consciousness. This immersive film ultimately forges a counter-narrative of endurance and survival as the villagers keep culture alive through art.

“If we don’t answer the question of Sudanese identity,” says one of the intellectuals whom Kuka includes in the discussion, “then the war will continue.” The villagers echo this sentiment, for they insist on the endurance of a dual Arabic-African identity, whereas the majority oppresses blackness in an overwhelmingly predominant black culture. Some villagers express a submission to the placement of Arabic culture over a black identity, for one interviewee demonstrates a costly process by which she lightens her skin to erase a part of herself. Alternatively, other villagers insist on singing in the local tribal language, while others use its name, Rutana, as a pejorative.

Kuka lets the villagers tell their stories using their own songs, words, dances, and rhythms. Beats of the Antonov shows the celebration of culture as the defiant assertion for diversity in the face of oppression. The film cuts a multiplicity of voices—villagers, militia, academics, and more— together in a steady chorus. The range of voices, languages, and beats shows the fallacy of imposing one majority culture by force. The music itself is beautiful, though—the film has a great soundtrack—and the delight one receives in hearing the music lets the tunes subtly note the richness that the diversity of cultures brings to the world.

Beats of the Antonov screens:

Friday, Sept. 5 at 7:15 pm at TIFF Bell Lightbox 4

Sunday, Sept. 7 at 12:45 pm Scotiabank 9

Thursday, Sept. 11 at 9:45 pm at AGO Jackman Hall

TIFF 2014 Review: 'Beats of the Antonov' Finds A New Perspective From Which To Explore The Civil War In Sudan

By Zeba Blay, September 15, 2014

Source: IndieWire’s Shadow and Act

It isn’t the beats of the bombs falling from the sky, but the beats of the traditional Sudanese music lovingly showcased here that above all else, makes this documentary so uniquely captivating.

“Beats of the Antonov” succeeds where other documentaries and narrative films about war and suffering on the African continent often fail, in that it finds a new, genuinely interesting perspective from which to explore a complex situation. The directorial debut of Sudanese filmmaker Hajooj Kuka, the film is a portrait of refugees of the Blue Nile and Nuba Mountains affected by the the civil war in Sudan, using their strong cultural ties to music and dance as a way of telling their stories.

The title refers to the Russian-manufactured Antonov planes used by the Sudanese government, which rain down bombs targeted towards rebels but in the process destroy the homes and lives of Sudanese villagers without discrimination. The film opens with one such horrific bombing, followed minutes later by a kind of spiritual musical moment, as the villagers gather in the wake of carnage in celebration of life.

This is a story about the Sudanese, told by the Sudanese - Kuka uses fly-on-the-wall footage of the revelry of the refugees, interspersed with simply shot interviews with not just experts and intellectuals like the Sudanese-born music scholar Sarah Abunama-Elgadi, but both civilians and soldiers alike.

It's through these interviews that the viewer gains further insight into the identity crisis that Sudan is facing, the push-pull between Arab and African and the implications of embracing one or the other. Never editorializing, Kuka presents all sides - from those Sudanese eager to embrace both an African and Arab identity, to those willing to erase their Africanness and therefore their blackness - one young woman intimately reveals how she lightens her skin in order to look "more Arab."

It isn't the beats of the bombs falling from the sky, but the beats of the traditional Sudanese music lovingly showcased here that above all else, makes this documentary so uniquely captivating. It isn't very surprisingly that the film won the People's Choice Documentary Award at TIFF, beating out Ethan Hawke's "Seymour: An Introduction" and the much buzzed about "Do I Sound Gay?"

Kuka has crafted a deeply personal but also deeply enlightening record of a situation that so many of think we know but don't truly understand. It may be a cliché concept, but the music here really is a kind of universal language, brilliantly and beautifully conveying a kind of national identity that is as diverse as it is distinct.